The Westfalian TW34

TASTING NOTES

NOSE

This bottling is astonishingly clean – no unpleasant fusel oils, no immature notes. Instead, a fascinating interplay of aromas unfolds, immediately reminding us of the Scottish coast. The maritime saltiness literally jumps out of the glass, accompanied by a delicate vanilla note that acts as a gentle counterpoint. A green apple joins in, fresh and crisp, before the smoky elements enter the stage. It is not the aggressive peat smoke of an Ardbeg or Laphroaig, but rather the memory of an extinguished campfire – warm, inviting, with a hint of ash. A peppery sharpness heralds the power of this cask strength without being overwhelming. The 63.5% is present but well integrated. You can sense the potential, but you also notice that this whisky could benefit from a few drops of water. The nose is complex, multi-layered and invites you to linger – you could spend minutes here without getting bored.

PALATE

Citrus notes dance on the tongue, followed by creamy vanilla. The cleanliness we already noticed on the nose continues – no distracting undertones, just pure concentration on the essentials. Then comes the smoke. Voluminous, powerful, but never coarse. It fills the entire mouth. Tobacco joins in, light herbal notes – perhaps thyme or sage – add additional complexity. The texture is oily and full-bodied, which is not surprising given the cask strength and the absence of chill filtration. Despite its power, the TW34 remains elegant and balanced. The saltiness comes to the fore again, maritime and intense. With a few drops of water, the whisky opens up even more, becoming more accessible without losing any of its character. The balance between sweetness, smoke and spice is remarkable – someone has shown a fine hand in selecting the casks here.

FINISH

The finale begins with a surprising note: old deerskin jacket, that special blend of leather, tobacco and a hint of sweetness that is difficult to describe but instantly recognisable. The campfire returns, this time not as embers, but as an active fire. The saltiness remains present, carried by a wave of smoke that is long and lingering without becoming tiresome.
